THE 2026 ELECTION

THE IMPACT OF THE 2026 MID-TERM RACES

Democrats Win Majority In Blue Wave

The 2026 election brings a new Democratic majority to both the House of Representatives and the Senate, ending Republican control of the House since 2023 and Republican control of the Senate since 2025. Not only did Democrats win, but they often won in deep red states that had not seen Democratic wins in decades or more, and did so (in some cases) with double-digit margins. Democrats will leverage their new majorities to implement robust oversight, advance their own policy and committee agendas, and have control over the "pen" when drafting annual funding bills. They, too, will have the ability to utilize Budget Reconciliation to advance their own priorities without needing Republican votes – a key tool Republicans have used in the 119th Congress. The power shift that will occur with a new bicameral Democratic majority will spur significant shifts across politics, personnel, and policy.

> "A Democratic win brings an entirely new power structure to Congress, but Democrats will face some significant hurdles -- not the least of which will be needing the support of the President and Republican Senators to get legislation across the finish line."

New Majorities Face Hurdles

Despite having the House and Senate majorities, the path to successful policymaking will be difficult for Democrats in the 120th Congress. With somewhat narrow majorities, Democrats will still need to rely on both Senate Republicans and President Trump to move legislation over the finish line, which will require delicate negotiation across the political aisle. Adding to the complexity will be robust oversight happening while Democrats seek to move legislation - an awkward dance between Democrats and the President. Furthermore, the new majorities will most certainly face internal divisions within the Democratic caucuses; a common headache for leadership when one party wins the majority.

2028 Is On the Horizon

While the new Congress prepares to begin their work, the 2028 presidential election is just around the corner. Candidates are expected to begin announcing their candidacy for President early in the new year (or at least making moves to do so). The 2028 election will, in part, drive the 120th Congress, as much of Congress' messaging, policy, and politics will be in alignment with the presidential election cycle. Both sides of the political aisle will need to balance what they are able to get done early (before politics takes center stage) and how to best leverage the legislative process to gain some advantage in 2028.

10 FACTORS TO WATCH IN THE 120TH CONGRESS

1

Bipartisanship Remains Essential: The Senate majority will require any legislative proposal (outside of budget reconciliation) to advance with both Democratic and Republican support. A 60-vote threshold in the Senate will ensure that both parties will need to work together to get any legislation to the President's desk. Additionally, the President will have the final say on any legislative initiative, so without his support, Democratic proposals will have a tough road ahead.

2

Oversight Will Be an Early Priority: The new Democratic majority will begin the new Congress with a broad series of oversight initiatives – most of which will be linked to the President and his senior staff. Oversight will create an awkward dance with the White House, which will be unlikely to align with Democrats on policy while the Administration and their allies are being scrutinized by congressional committees. Democrats will likely face some pressure internally to balance oversight with the need to advance legislative initiatives.

3

The President Will Continue to Lead with Executive Orders: President Trump is already on a record-breaking pace with the number of executive orders he has issued since his election win two years ago. Executive Orders allow him to advance policies without the lengthy process required to move legislation (and without the need to get the support of both parties). This is the easiest way to leverage executive branch power, and President Trump will continue to use it often.

4

Some Cabinet Members Are Expected to Leave: Some of the cabinet members, including some who are high-profile, are likely to leave soon after the election – moves that are not unusual, especially when the President's party loses power in Congress. Leaving the cabinet, however, will not prevent the robust Democratic oversight agenda that is anticipated. The President will work quickly to find new nominees when those departures are announced, which could also face some hurdles in a Democratic Senate.

5

The Looming 2028 Election Will Force Both Parties to Secure Wins: The 2028 presidential election will begin in early 2027, and Democrats will need to work hard to secure policy wins that can help elevate their candidates (at all levels) in 2028 while seeking to unify the party going into an important election. Without the power to control the agenda, Republicans will focus on messaging to create a contrast with the Democratic agenda. Where possible, both parties will work together to secure bipartisan wins that benefit everyone. That being said, those initiatives that bring Republicans and Democrats together will be few and far between, especially early in the new Congress.

6

New Leadership Teams Will Struggle Early: Moving from the minority to the majority will be tougher than many congressional observers are expecting. Democrats have been in the position to oppose congressional leadership; they will soon be transitioning to congressional leadership positions, which come with their own set of problems and headaches – not the least of which will be managing expectations of Democratic members and preventing the type of internal disagreements Republicans dealt with.

7

A New Rules Package Will Shape the 120th Congress: One of the lesser-known areas leveraged in a new Congress is the annual Rules Package, which is drafted by the new majority and passed on the first day of the 120th Congress. This package adjusts the Congressional rules and procedures, which is a significant advantage for the Democrats, who will be able to position the rules package to align with their goals.

8

Divisions Will Emerge Early in the New Congress: Intra-party division is normal when significant changes happen in Congress. Policymakers differ on strategies related to messaging, policy, and politics. The new majorities may face new factions that leverage a small handful of policymakers to influence overall direction. None of this is abnormal, but it can be difficult to manage and will likely cause some headaches for the new leadership team. Maintaining party unity in the majority is often a challenge, especially early in the new Congress.

9

Varied Republican Relationships with the President Will Create Internal Division Early: Leadership elections will expose a deep divide that emerged on the campaign trail. This divide includes one group in fairly safe districts that has doubled down on the Trump agenda and another group that is looking for separation from the Trump agenda, given the political risk it brought to races this year. This is going to force some awkward and maybe even difficult "family" discussions in the days and weeks ahead.

10

Parties Will Soon Turn to the 2028 Election: The 2028 election has already started (quietly), but will ramp up quickly in the first two quarters of 2027. The impact of the looming 2028 election on the 120th Congress and the White House agenda cannot be overstated. Decisions around policy priorities, areas of bipartisanship, and messaging will be made, in part, through a 2028 election lens, and that focus (and coordination) will increase as nominees become more apparent.
